The U.S. Department of Agriculture's Natural Resources Conservation Service in California said it has received about $2.7 million to fund 11 conservation projects statewide.

The project list includes $343,884 to the University of California, Davis, for habitat plantings for agricultural settings.

Funds are distributed via the National Conservation Innovation Grants program, which invests in on-the-ground conservation technologies and approaches to enhance water quality, air quality, energy conservation and environmental markets.
